Reading Suggestions

- •Can you name the mountains that surround your home? Learn their names and research to see if there are stories about their names, shapes, etc.
- Plan a family vacation to Towoac, Colorado, where you can see Sleeping Ute Mountain.
- Keep a journal of the seasons. Journals aren't just about lots of writing (although some would be good). Your journal can be like a scrapbook, filled with photos, drawings, and other souveniers. You can write about what you've been doing, or interview other members of your family for interesting stories. You can even write about books or movies you've enjoyed.

Someday, when the Ute people are once again in danger, the Sleeping Warrior will rise to help drive the Evil Ones out of the land.

The Native American Indian Literacy Project was made possible by funds from the Utah State Office of Education (USOE). It is a joint effort of the USOE and San Juan School District Media Center. For more information about this project, contact Shirlee Silversmith at (801) 538-7838.

The booklets are available on a CD from the USOE. You may print the booklets off the CD, free of charge, for educational purposes. If you would like to purchase printed copies of the booklets, contact San Juan School District Media Center at (435) 678-1229.

During every season, he lets clouds emerge from his pockets to gather over the highest peak whenever he is happy with his people.

Snow blankets the Sleeping Ute in winter white.

Long, long ago, the Evil Ones roamed the earth creating trouble, so a Great Warrior God came to battle them.

He and the Evil Ones kicked and yanked one another. They punched and wrestled. As they did, their feet pushed up the land into mountains. Valleys formed in their footprints.

His fall mantle is woven from red and yellow colors.

During summer, the Sleeping Warrior wears an emerald cover.

Even though the Evil Ones injured the Great Warrior, he defeated them. Then he lay down to recover. Blood poured from his wounds and turned into living water for all creatures to drink.

When fog clings to Wisuv Káruv, or Sleeping Ute Mountain, he is changing his blanket. The pale green one means spring has arrived.

Today, the Great Warrior, still wearing his headdress, sleeps on his back with his arms folded across his chest.
