Annette and FACS teachers,

Annette's question made me curious about where these pictures and info had come from. So I searched the web and found out that they came from a book called "Hungry Planet." Then I checked the following website

<http://www.menzelphoto.com/books/hp.html>

about the book and there is a link to this website

<http://catalog.socialstudies.com/c/product.html?record@TF39905+s@huDS0AXEAoDuY>

where you can buy the pictures as posters or in a power point presentation with a curriculum that goes along with it. The book is available at Amazon for much less than the website sells it for and the powerpoint is a little pricey, but I looked over the content and it seemed well done with some interesting questions about the foods and the life styles of the countries etc. It would be a great unit to do cross curricular with World Geography.

The pictures were also posted on Time's website

http://www.time.com/time/photogallery/0,29307,1626519_1373675,00.html

Also, one good thing about using the pictures and content from the Time website is that you can use them without violating copyright.

Ruth Merrill

Subject: [facs] weekly family food pictures

This is to the person that sent out those great pictures of families around the world and what they ate for a week. I saved the pictures, but they didn't print with the country with them. Could you send me the pictures and the countries again, or maybe just a description of the family and their country?

Thanks, Annette Castillo
