Movie making and editing, or slide show presentations.

Intended Learning Outcomes
Students will identify their unique talents and strengths, and demonstrate the ability to set and achieve goals.

Instructional Procedures
Read the text in Open Court or Houghton Mifflin (refer to the bibliography below) and discuss the talents of the characters. Talk about what a talent is and how people get them. Discuss natural and acquired talents.
Give the students a lined paper and have them write at least 4 of their personal talents or strengths.
Allow them time to work with a small group so that group members can help name each other's talents or strengths.
Inform students that you are going to make a movie (or slide show presentation) with each small group (since a whole class movie would be too long, it would be easier to watch several small group presentations.) Each presentation needs to include:
1. What talents/strengths are.
2. How you get them.
3. How they make you unique.
4. How they help you to be physically, mentally, and socially healthy.
5. Who your audience is.
6. Choose a format, such as, a advertisement, documentary, story, political campaign, game show, etc.
7. One talent of each member of the group.
Tell students that their presentations will be shared with the class.
After viewing the movies/presentations, ask students to write down one talent/strength that they would like to improve on during the year. Have them write down a goal that they think they can reach this school year. Instruct them to write down what they need to do to reach that goal. Inform students that at the end of the year, they are going to review their goals and make a sequel to their movie/presentation.

Strategies for Diverse Learners
English Language Learners can do their portion of the presentation in their native language with subtitles or some sort of translation into English.

Extensions
At the end of the year, make a sequel to the first movie/presentation to show how students have made progress on their goals. Include ways that their goal achievement has affected their physical, social, and mental health.

Assessment Plan
Have students help you rate student presentations according to the rubric
